Surgical treatment of acute mesenteric ischemia in a pregnant patient. The diagnosis of acute mesenteric ischemia (AMI) is sometimes difficult in pregnant women because of their abdominal discomfort and nonspecific clinical findings. The purpose of this article is to report a case of AMI in a pregnant woman successfully managed by revascularization and maternal-fetal treatment. A 29-year-old pregnant woman, 33 weeks of gestation, was admitted with severe abdominal discomfort and acute abdomen. This was associated with upper gastrointestinal bleeding and disseminated intravascular coagulopathy. Computed tomography showed severe mesenteric ischemia. The patient was managed with an axillobifemoral bypass, total gastrectomy, and selective mesenteric revascularization. The patient and the fetus
